Ăchĕlōus, oï, m. A famous river of Epirus in Greece, rising out of mount Pindus, and dividing Ætolia from Acarnania; hod. Pachicolmo. The poets give it a person, and say he was the son of Oceanus and Tethys; or of the Sun and Earth, as some say, whom Hercules engaged in single combat for Deïanira, daughter to the king of Calydonia, to whom both had pretensions, and conquered him, though he changed himself first into a serpent, then into a bull; in which form having lost one of his horns, he was obliged to compound for it by giving Hercules the horn of plenty (Vid. Amalthæa). He at last changed himself into a river, The meaning of the fable is, that this was a great river, and therefore fitly called the son of Oceanus. That it had many turnings and windings, therefore is fitly expressed by a serpent. The roaring noise which it maketh when it overfloweth its banks, whereby the adjacent fields become fruitful, answer well to the labours and roaring of a bull; under which figure therefore the poets frequently describe rivers. The two streams, or channels which it had, are the two horns in the fiction; one of which branches, being dammed up by Hercules to prevent its spoiling the country, is described by the cutting off one horn; and the fruitfulness which thereupon succeeded, is the fabulous horn of plenty, Mythol.

The son of Peleus king of Thessaly, and of Thetis, the goddess of the sea. His mother dipped him all over, when he was a child, in the river Styx, to make him invulnerable, except that part of his foot which she held him by when dipped. He was afterwards put under the tuition of Chiron the Centaur, to learn to ride the great horse, and to play upon music, Vid. Stat. in fin. Achill. His mother was warned by the oracle, that if he went to the wars of Troy with other princes, he should be slain there; wherefore she sent him away in woman's apparel, and procured that he should lie hid amongst the daughters of Lycomedes, where he got with child one of his daughters named Deidamia, of whom Pyrrhus was born: but it being prophesied, that unless Achilles did help, Troy could not be conquered, Ulysses by craft found him out. He had certain armour made by Vulcan, at the request of Thetis, which could be pierced by no human force Out of peevishness for Agamemnon's taking away Briseis from him, he forbore fighting, till the death of his friend Patroclus; to revenge which he went again to battle, slew Hector, and dragged him at his chariot thrice about the walls of Troy, and afterwards sold his body to his father king Priam for a great sum; concerning which Ennius wrote a tragedy, called Hectoris lytra, from the Greek verb λύω solvo. On this argument Lucan also wrote in his youth, as we learn from Statius, Syl. 2. 7. 55. At last he was slain by Paris, being shot in the heel.

[Ἀμάλθεια, Gr. ab ἀμαλθεύω, multiplico, nutrio] The nurse of Jupiter. Melissus king of Crete had two daughters, Amalthea and Melissa, who fed Jupiter when a child, with goats milk and honey. Jupiter for her good services afterward made her a star, and gave one of her horns to his two nurses, when he was come of age; imparting to it this virtue, that the horn should supply every thing they wished for. Ovid says, that Amalthea was the nymph who nursed him, and that the goat by accident breaking off her horn against a tree, she filled it with flowers and fruit, and put it to Jupiter's mouth; for which he turned her into a star, and honoured the horn with the name of Plenty. Ἀμαλθείας κέρας, Prov. Ammon, ōnis. m. A name of Jupiter, whoſe temple was in the deſerts of Libya, for which reaſon ſome have derived it from Ἄμμος, arena; but the name not being Greek, but purely Ægyptian, as Plutarch, as well as Herodotus in Euterpe affirm, it ſeemeth more probable to derive it from חמה the ſun, under which name Macrobius hath ſhown Jupiter to be worſhipped. This is further confirmed by the manner of his worſhip, which was under the form of a ram, whence he is ſtyled corniger. For the word קרן ſignifieth both a horn and a ray of light. His oracle was in reputation in the time of Alexander the Great, but began to be neglected in the reign of Tiberius, as Strabo, who then lived, telleth us, and more in the time of Trajan, as we learn from Plutarch's treatiſe of oracles, and more and more deſpiſed as the light of the goſpel ſhined clearer.

But afterwards being with-child by Jupiter, she was suspected by Dirce, whom Lycus had married, to be still familiar with her husband, who therefore ordered her to be cast into prison; from whence she was delivered by Jupiter, and fled into the mountain Citheron; and there, in a place where two ways met, brought forth twins, which were educated by the shepherds as their own. They called one of them Zethus, ἀπὸ τοῦ ζητεῖν τόπον, and the other Amphion, ὅτι ἐν διόδῳ ἡ μήτηρ αὐτὸν ἔτικεν. When they were grown up and understood the injuries done by Dirce to their mother, they tied her to the tail of a mad bull, which dragged her on the craggy rocks, till Bacchus pitying her, turned her into a fountain of the same name. Amphion became an excellent musician, having been presented with a lute by Mercury, on which he played so sweetly, that he brought the stones together wherewith the tower of Thebes was built, Hor. A Poët. 394. & Sil. 11. 455 By thus receiving a lute from Mercury is meant, that he was a very eloquent men; and by his bringing the stones together, that he persuaded the rude and barbarous people to join together in one body, and pursue one common interest, building themselves a city, wherein to live under certain laws agreed upon by common consent, and fortifying a tower as a defence against their enemies.

Aurēlius Antōnīnus, surnamed the Philosopher, was a man of wonderful humanity, justice, temperance, and all princely virtues, as his works which are still extant evidently show, for he lived as he writ. He chose for his colleague in the empire L. Aurelius Verus, after whose death he reigned alone, and had great success against the Germans, the Sarmatians, Vandals, Quadi, and Marcomanni. Antonius Commodus was his successor in the empire, but not in his virtues.

M. Antōnius, The name of many great Romans. Their family was derived from Antius the son of Hercules. (1) M. Antonius, an excellent orator, was slain with many other great men by the Marian faction. He had two sons, named Marcus and Caius, the former whereof was a very profligate man. The latter commanding some troops of Sylla's horse, plundered many places in Greece. He was surnamed Hybrida. (2) Marcus Antonius, son to the former of these, and grandson to the orator, was the fomenter of the civil war. For while tribune, he left the city privately, and fled to Cæsar into Gaul. He invaded the province of Brutus, and by the persuasion of Tully the senate voted him an enemy to the republic. He was beaten by the two consuls Hirtius and Pansa, assisted young Cæsar, but some time after joined in a league with Octavius and Lepidus, and hence their goverment was called a triumvirate. Immediately upon this he vanquished the forces of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi in Macedon. He divorced his wife Fulvia, in order to marry Octavia sister to Octavius. But for the love he bore Cleopatra queen of Egypt, he slighted her also, which Octavius resenting, made war upon him, overcame him in a sea fight at Actium, and forced him to fly to Alexandria, where, being besieged by Cæsar, in despair he fell upon his own sword. (1) Vid. Val. Max. 9. 2. & Luc. 2. 122. & seq. (2) Plin. 15 1.

Julius Antōnius, The son of Marcus, was consul with Paulus Fab. Maximus. To this man Horace addresseth his second ode of the fourth book. His notorious incontinence with Julia, the daughter of Augustus, he revenged on himself with his own hand, as Paterculus telleth us, 2. 100. But that it was by the command of Augustus we learn from Tacitus, Ann. 4. 44. 4.

Antōnius Gnipho, was of Gaul, but came to Rome, where he taught rhetoric and poetry in the house of Julius Cæsar while yet a boy. His school was frequented by Tully, and other famous men. He set no price on his labours, and therefore his scholars were the more liberal to him. He lived fifty years, Suet. de Illust. Gramm. 7.

He offering her gifts in case of compliance, she was at last overcome, and consented to his embraces; whereupon taking his own shape again, he upbraided her with her infidelity. Procris for shame fled into the woods; but being reconciled, she gave her husband a dart, which would never miss, and a hound called Lælaps; with these Cephalus went into the woods a hunting. She being jealous, went to watch him, and hid herself in a thicket. Cephalus being weary and hot, lay down near her, and called upon Aura, to refresh him. She thinking he had called for Aurora, roused up herself, and stirred the bushes; whereupon Cephalus, thinking it had been a wild beast, threw the javelin, and killed her. Cĕres, ĕris. f. [sic dict. qu. Geres, à gerendis frugibus, Varr. vel à cereo, pro quo nunc dicimus creo, Serv. qv. frugum creatrix] The daughter of Saturn and Ops, the goddess of corn and tillage. She had by Jupiter one daughter, named Proserpina, whom Pluto privately enticed away, and took with him into his infernal kingdom. Ceres missing her, and not knowing what was become of her, lighted torches on mount Ætna (which, they say, hath burnt ever since) and sought for her all the world over; in her travels she came to king Eleusius, and undertook the tuition of his son Triptolemus. When he was come to age, she provided him a chariot drawn with winged dragons, that he might travel through the world, and teach people husbandry, who lived before on acorns, and other natural productions of the earth. Afterwards hearing that her daughter was carried away by Pluto, she went to Jupiter, and complained to him of the injury done her. Jupiter granted that she should return back, on condition that she had tasted nothing in hell whilst she was there; but it being proved by the witness of Ascalaphus, that she had eaten some of a pomgranate, as she walked in Pluto's orchard, all hope of return vanished; wherefore, in revenge, she turned Ascalaphus into an owl. Cicĕro, ōnis. m. Marcus Tully Cicero, father of the Latin eloquence, the greatest orator that ever the Roman state bred, or employed. He was born at a mean town in Italy, called Arpinum, but the greatness of his genius soon made him taken notice of, so that making easy steps through the lower honours, he was admitted into the chair of state. He acquitted himself in his consulship so well, that he was the first who ever was honoured with the glorious title of father of his country. He was a great lover of the state, and an unwearied defender thereof; Catiline's conspiracy and the Agrarian law, are ample testimonies of his vigilance and industry. He was banished the city by Clodius, at that time tribune, against whom he made that incomparable speech for Milo; but was with honour restored. In the civil wars he took part with Pompey, as thinking the public liberty lay on that side, to which he always to his last breath showed himself a constant friend. He had one son, unworthy of such a father, to whom, when he was a young student at Athens, he sent his book of Offices, a book which gave the first handle to the invention of Printing in Europe. He had a brother too, Quintus Cicero, once Cæsar's lieutenant general in Gaul, and afterwards proconsul in Asia. He was slain by order of Mark Anthony in the sixty third year of his age.

* Dædălus, i. m. [à δαιδάλλω, ic o; vel δαιδάλλω, vario, Fest.] An Athenian artificer, the most ingenious in the world; whence the proverb, Dædali opera, when we would commend a thing for the curiousness of the work. He invented the saw, the ax, the plummet, the augur, glue, cement, sails for ships, the sail-yard; and statues so contrived as to make the eyes move as if living; being accused of the death of Perdix, his nephew, he fled into Crete, and there made the Labyrinth, into which Minos put him and his son Icarus, because he had made a cow of wood, wherein Pasiphaë putting herself, became guilty of monstrous lewdness. He seeing no way of escape, desired feathers and wax, to make a present, as he pretended, for the king, but therewith he made himself and his son wings, and so flew from Crete to Sardinia, and from thence to Cumæ, where, having lost his son by the way, he built a temple to Apollo. The meaning of the fable is, that Dædalus being privy to the adultery of Pasiphaë, the wife of Minos, with his servant named Taurus, was cast into prison with his son Icarus; but they, and some other discontented persons flying from Crete, in some small vessels, Minos pursued them so briskly, that the ship in which Icarus was, split against the rocks; but Dædalus having found out the use of sails, and the king using oars only, got first to Sicily, and so escaped the fury of his pursuer; whence the proverb, Remigiis Dædaliis, to signify a thing done with dexterity and speed. *Vid. Laŏmĕdon, ontis. m. The son of Ilus king of Troy, who hired Apollo and Neptune to build the walls of Troy, but refused to pay them after the work was done. They, in revenge, sent plagues upon the city. Laomedon consulted the oracle on this occasion, but could have no remedy, except by giving a Trojan virgin every year to be devoured by a sea monster. His daughter Hesione was drawn out by lot for the sacrifice. Hercules offered to deliver her, and slay the sea monster, if he would give him his horses that were of a divine breed; but neither would he perform this agreement: whereupon Hercules sacked the city, slew him, and gave Hesione in marriage to Telamon. Vid. Hor. But finding the state much out of order, he bent his mind to redress it, which he did by a body of laws he had collected in his travels, by study and observation, and obliged the lords and commons of the Spartans to keep them inviolable till he returned from Delphos. When he came thither, and found Apollo highly approved them, he sent the oracle to Sparta, dismissed his friends, and retired a voluntary exile to Crete; where dieing, he ordered his body to be thrown into the sea, that the Spartans might not think themselves discharged of their oath by procuring his bones to be brought to Sparta.
